These pictures show the experiment that helped explain what learned helplessness is.

First, try to put the pictures in chronological order, as you think the experiment unfolded.

Second, guess the meaning of learned helplessness:

- a temporary lack of motivation caused by being tired or bored.
- a personality trait that makes a person naturally lazy and passive.
- a cognitive expectation that you cannot avoid the failure/pain.

Third, watch the video to check your answers!

Match the pictures with the stages of the experiment:

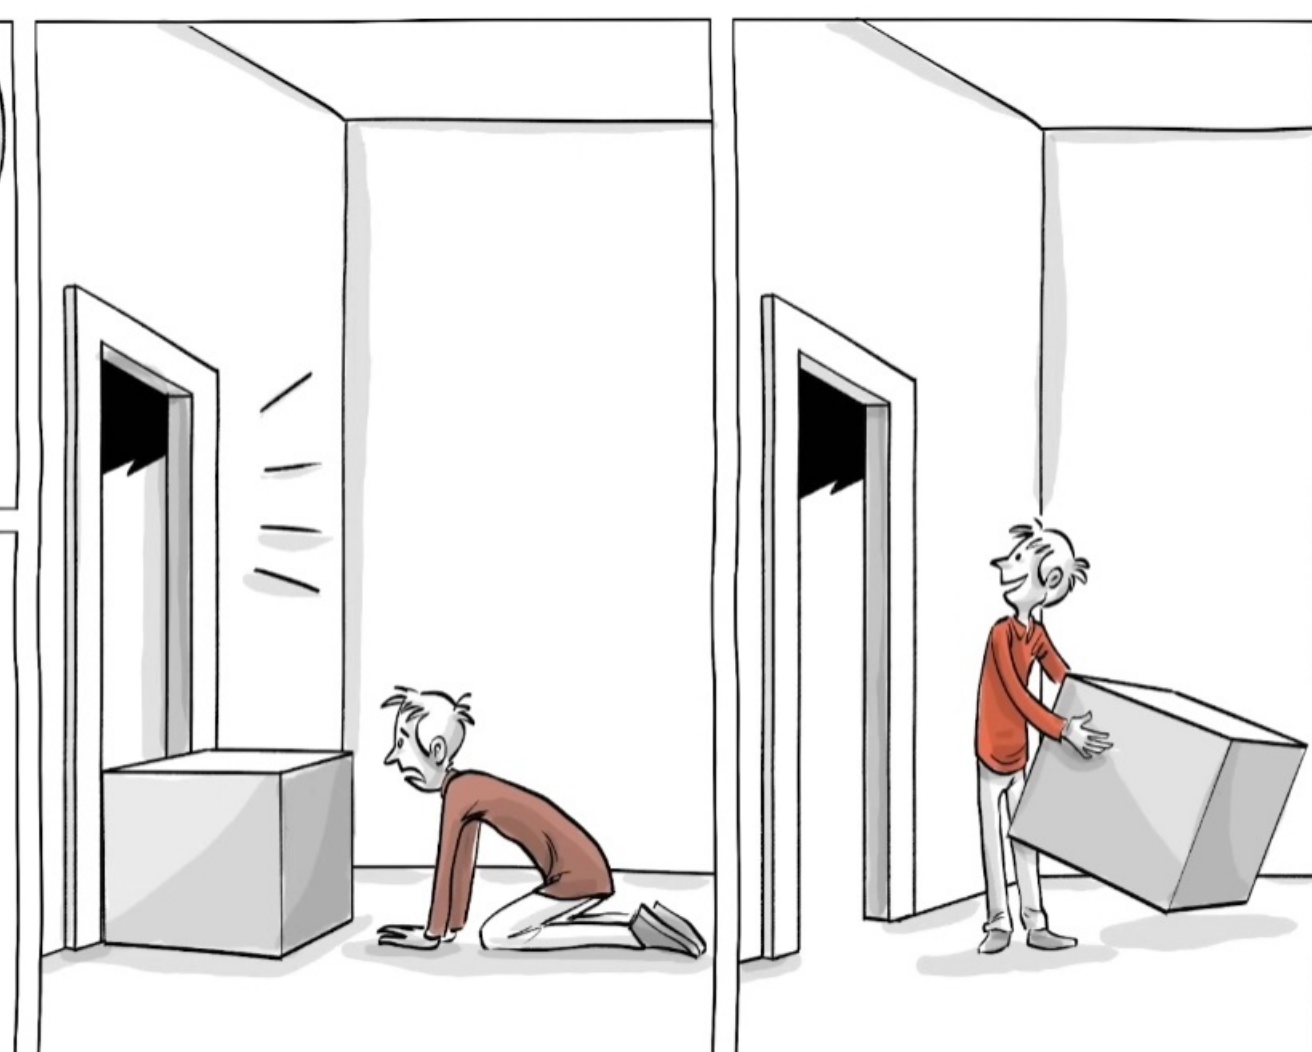

- But the third group did not try to escape. They had learned that they could not avoid the pain.
- Martin Seligman and Steven F. Maier. They worked with three groups of dogs.
- The second group got electric shocks, but they could stop the shocks by pressing a button.
- Later, all three groups were put in a box with shocks on one side only.
- The first group was caged and then released. This was the control group.
- The first and second groups quickly moved to the safe side.
- The third group also got shocks, but they could not stop them.

Tell Joe's story from the second part of the video in your own words.

What are your thoughts?

- How can we help those that fail to see the path out of their toxic life?
- How can we help them to help themselves?
